In the Middle Ages, there was a great deal of continuous work being done on making weapons and firearms. The production of these weapons often depended on copper and iron ore which was mined from different places in the world. When these metal ores were mined, a large amount would become waste as it could not be matched with any other use for it. So, in order to dispose of this metal waste, people would burn it. One of the most commonly used materials to burn at that time was charcoal. The carbon created from burning charcoal was useful as it could be used in many ways. Charcoal has many uses including cooking food, making plaster and plastering walls or floors. Charcoal is also used as a cleaner for your home which is why they are still available today at any hardware store where you can buy charcoal for your furnace or stove! The black colour of the book comes from its speciality which is the creation of the black colour through the use of powdered graphite. Graphite is one of the specialties that are made into pencils today, making it very useful in making an erasable writing pencil. Being able to erase your writing was a wonderful discovery in the world of drawing so they were used by many generations. But with the advent of computer technology, their use has diminished. But, how do you get rid of the black colour through this book? As mentioned above, it involves using charcoal for this process. When using charcoal on canvas or paper to create art, expect different results depending on the amount used on the work of art.
